Uncovering Tanglin's Military Roots

Back in the 1850s, the British government bought over Mount Harriet and started construction for Tanglin Barracks. The first barracks were built where Dempsey Hill and Loewen by Dempsey Hill are currently located. Post-independence, the Singapore government gained ownership of Tanglin Barracks.

The site remained unused until the Ministry of Defence made the compound its headquarters in 1972. The property housed the Central Manpower Base, where 18-year-old boys starting their National Service reported to the military.

A Walk through Bygone Days at Dempsey Hill

"At the time, there were probably 500 servicemen housed in identical, nondescript buildings in Blocks 7, 8, 9 and 10 at Dempsey Road. They had access to facilities such as a swimming pool and cinema, both now demolished, and a gymnasium overlooking the cricket pitch – a building that still stands today," Former British Serviceman Gary Bennet shared, about bygone days.

Bennet lived in the north end of Block 9. Back then, each block was split into three sections. The north and south ends were where the boys slept, while the centre section was devoted to communal washing, showers and toilets. Presently, this centre section is occupied by REDSEA Gallery and ARTitude Galeria. Drawing on his memory, Bennet guessed that parts of the old north/south accommodation areas were also used as the gallery's showroom.

Visit the Past at Loewen

Kerry Taylor was a driver for the Women's Royal Army Corp unit from 1963 to 1965. "Block 73 was where the girls lived.

Block 72 was for administration and where the officers worked. On days off and in the evenings, we would sometimes go to the Tanglin Military Services Club. It was there that I met an Australian soldier. We started 'going out', fell in love and decided to marry. Our wedding was lovely, in the beautiful St George Church with all our army 'family' around us."

Today, Block 73 is home to Invictus International School, which Taylor found fascinating. "The fact that the building that was my home for two years back in the '60s is now a place of education for young people is perfect! I especially like that the history of the area is being honoured."
